Villager reminisces about Knudson tree

When Knudson Field was built in 1968, it had a large oak tree just inside the left center field fence, and George Cantone took advantage of it.

A chilling visit to site of King’s assassination

I tried not to hyperventilate as I stood dead in my tracks, sucking in arid air and realizing what I was seeing. I hadn’t realized the National Civil Rights Museum was 100 feet away.

I approached the National Civil Rights Museum from blocks away and been able to take small mental bites. But I'd approached the National Civil Rights Museum and been able to take small mental bites. The black-and-white images from April 4, 1968, now had color more vivid than fresh-from-fridge Kodachrome.
